distinguish savings on this account, and others which are stated in more general terms. There is, however, a record of economies resulting through vacant positions not being required to be filled during the year, the total value of which was £8,000. In addition, indirect, economies of quite £3,000 have resulted from a utilization of excess officers for temporary work in other Departments instead of engaging temporary clerks.

As regards the savings estimated in August last, the following is the present position:—

The unseen economies of the year resulting from the better disposition of the staff wherever this could be arranged were considerable, but it is difficult to allot a definite amount, owing to the fact that the Service must continue to expand rapidly so long as the revenue continues to increase. Under some headings the additional cost of collecting additional revenue is high.

The economies likely to result from the amalgamation of Departments, as is proposed elsewhere, cannot be estimated exactly. There is no doubt, however, that they will be considerable in the near future, if not at once.
