

A subsidiary series of booklets, smaller in size, but prepared with equal care and attention to good appearance, deals specifically with various phases of occupations in which intending immigrants may find scope in New Zealand. These comprise "Dairying in New Zealand"; "The Pastoral Industry in New Zealand"; "Agriculture in New Zealand"; "Fruitgrowing, Beekeeping, Poultry-farming, Horticulture in New Zealand"; and "Industrial New Zealand," the last-named dealing with the openings for immigrants other than on the land.

A considerable economy is secured by means of this scheme of specialized booklets, as an immigrant intending to go on the land is able to secure (in the booklet entitled "New Zealand") information of a general character about the Dominion, while his special requirements will be met by one or other of the subsidiary booklets covering in detail the occupation which he desires to enter on arriving in the Dominion. The artisan, for instance, will be furnished with literature concerning the trades and industries of the country, and will not be supplied with matter relating to land occupations in which he is not interested.

The booklets are very freely illustrated, as photographs are often more convincing than letter-press. The literary matter has been carefully compiled and written in an interesting manner, with an avoidance of statistical detail. Care has been taken to avoid exaggeration and overstatement, for the actual facts in regard to the resources of New Zealand, its productivity and its potentialities, are quite sufficient to indicate that it is an attractive country in which to settle.
